Timing is everything—especially if you are just conceived

You may be aware that pro-abortion forces are insisting that the U.S. Food and Drug Administration make “morning-after pills” available over the counter. What that means is that these powerful, mega-dose birth control pills would be as freely accessible as baby aspirin.

Among other things, one aspirin a day can protect you from a heart attack. But the usual recommended dosage of these “morning-after” pills can take the life of a baby — in other words, they can abort. That certainly isn’t healthy; so why is this idea even being considered?

Here are the facts. These pills work the same way the typical birth control pill works. They can stop conception. But if that fails to happen and fertilization occurs, the pills can make it impossible for the newly-conceived person to implant in his mother’s womb. If he cannot implant, he will die. Thus, the pills can abort a person.

The pro-abortion cartel, which includes mainstream medical organizations such as the American College of Obstetrics and Gynecology, has decided that pregnancy does not begin until one week after the baby begins. They say that there is no “pregnancy” until the baby is implanted in his mother’s womb. So, if the baby dies before that time, abortion supporters say he was not really there anyway; then what’s the big deal?

So when does motherhood begin? Will they tell us that it depends on whether or not the “pregnant woman” wants her child? As ridiculous as that sounds, that is exactly what the pro-abortion enthusiasts have done.

When a word needs to be redefined to suit their agenda, the pro-death crowd just starts double-talking to the media, and anyone else who will listen, and pretty soon everybody is marketing their lies for them.

That is what happened to change the way we perceive motherhood, pregnancy and even babies. Because in case you did not know it, the pro-abortion backers readily admit that abortion takes a life; they just believe that the life destroyed was less valuable than the mother’s right to “choose”

If none of this makes any sense to you, then you are on the right track because lies usually do not make sense. Sadly, in the case of abortion, those lies result in millions of dead human beings. And that is where you come in.

Alert your pharmacist to the fact that morning-after pills, or emergency contraception (or whatever they want to call those pills), can cause abortions.

Ask your doctor what he is doing to stop this dreadful deception. If he belongs to a professional organization, what is he doing to make sure the definitions used are accurate?

Tell everyone you know the facts about these potentially deadly pills. Lives depend on it.
